A Crucible Moment: College Learning and Democracy’s Future
How the National Report Has Spurred Action
2012-2014

“Not since Ernest Boyer’s Scholarship Reconsidered has a national report received such buzz and had such impact.”
VP for Outreach, Auburn University

The Creation of A Crucible Moment
In response to widespread concern about the nation’s anemic civic health, the US Department of Education contracted with The Global Perspectives Institute, Inc. (GPI) and The Association of American Colleges and Universities (AAC&U) to assess the status and vibrancy of civic learning in colleges and universities and to recommend how to animate education for democracy as a 21st century outcome of college. From 2011-2012, GPI and AAC&U organized a series of five national roundtables at the US Department of Education for nearly 140 participants from a wide range of constituents including among others: civic educators and scholars, college presidents, students, student affairs professionals, leaders of civic organizations; disciplinary associations, philanthropists, and federal government representatives. A National Task Force oversaw the project and draft versions of the evolving report were circulated for commentary through additional public forums.

On January 10, 2012 at a White House conference telecast nationally, the National Task Force on Civic Learning and Democratic Engagement (CLDE) released A Crucible Moment: College Learning and Democracy’s Future which called for A National Call to Action. In brief, Crucible Moment calls on higher education to reclaim its civic mission and to make civic learning at the college level expected rather than optional. To increase knowledge about civic ethos, literacy, inquiry, and action, the report calls for such learning to be pervasive and occur over time throughout the college experience: in both general education and college majors, in student life, in campus/community partnerships, and as an understood area of investigation and scholarship for faculty members across all disciplines.

Thanks to a grant from Bringing Theory to Practice and its donors the Christian A. Johnson Endeavor Foundation and S. Engelhard Center, AAC&U published and is continuing to disseminate A Crucible Moment widely. The report is also promoted as a pdf free on line through AAC&U, the US Department of Education, and a group of 13 national organizations that are in a coalition (The Civic Learning and Democratic Engagement Action Network) to coordinate collective and individual strategic actions that advance civic learning and democratic engagement through higher education.

A New Vision for Civic Learning in Higher Education
An earlier definition of civic education stressed familiarity with the various branches of government and acquaintance with basic information about U.S. history. This is still essential but no longer nearly enough. Americans need to understand how their political system works and how to influence it. But they also need to understand the cultural and global contexts in which democracy is both deeply valued and deeply contested. Moreover, the competencies basic to democracy, especially a diverse one like ours, cannot be learned only by studying books; democratic knowledge and capabilities are honed through hands-on, face-to-face, active engagement in the midst of differing perspectives about how to address common problems that affect the well-being of the nation and the world. Civic learning should prepare students with knowledge and for action in our communities and at their workplaces.
Overview of key Arenas of Action

A. Distribution of A Crucible Moment
As of January 2014, through AAC&U alone, 7,182 printed copies of Crucible have been sold or distributed freely; 24,788 individual visitors have viewed the PDF of ACM on the website, and another 6,911 copies of the PDF were downloaded. Thus, The Crucible Moment touch total is 38,881. If combined with data from AAC&U’s 12 other partner CLDE Action Network organizations and from visits and downloads on the Department of Education site, that number increase dramatically.

Many who receive copies of A Crucible Moment share it with others. Still more learn about ACM’s central ideas through the Campus Compact Praxis Brief written by several state compact leaders, while student affairs professionals learn about key concepts through the NASPA/Florida Campus Compact Reading Guide. Each of these is available for viewing, downloading, or purchasing from Campus Compact and NASPA respectively and on AAC&U’s website. The Department of Education also produced its own publication, Civic Learning and Engagement: A Road Map and a Call to Action, responding to recommendations in A Crucible Moment.

A Crucible Moment has also been introduced to hundreds if not thousands of other people through conferences, webinars, audio conferences, and workshops. Campus Compact with its 35 state chapters has been especially aggressive in promoting A Crucible Moment through its state and regional meetings and Caryn McTighe Musil who authored the report on behalf of others has spoken at conferences that represents 15 states.

A Crucible Moment has also gone global, primed through conferences and publications of the International Consortium for Higher Education, Civic Responsibility, and Democracy that has been working for the past twelve years in partnership with The Council of Europe and through Crucible Moment presentations in South Africa and Japan.

B. Snapshot of How Some Campuses Are Using A Crucible Moment to Advance Civic Commitments

Wake Forest University used Crucible Moment’s Civic Learning Matrix through a newly created university-wide task force to identify areas of institutional strength and weakness across civic ethos, literacy, inquiry, and action. One of their findings caused them to focus more on developing more co-curricular opportunities to increase students’ civic literacy and enhance their social Action Collaborative to increase students’ sense of efficacy in solving shared problems.

Oregon State University, inspired by A Crucible Moment’s challenge to make civic learning more pervasive across campus domains, began to re-map organizational boundaries between student and academic affairs by making non-classified staff newly defined as professional faculty with service on the Faculty senate and its committees. The process has facilitated cross-campus collaboration and a sense of shared ownership of student learning goals overall and education for democracy in particular.

Fort Hays State University used Crucible Moment’s Civic Investment Plan in a new strategic plan and first gathered data as ACM recommended which was then used to inform a set of recommendations to improve existing activities, expand efforts to reach all students, and institutionalize civic work across the university. They have adopted the educational framework for a civic-minded campus (ethos, literacy, inquiry, and action) and created eight recommendations that include among them the development of the “engaged scholar” with specific metrics, adopting an academic focus across general education and the major for civic learning, and promoting a campus structure and culture that models civic learning and engagement.
Kingsborough Community College used *A Crucible Moment*s call to provide every student with a civic learning opportunity as inspiration for instituting a two-part civic engagement requirement for every Kingsborough graduate. One or both can be within a course or one can be in a course and the other within student life. They have a host of CE sections now certified in their curriculum and co-curriculum with more on the way. Both are matched with strong faculty and staff development opportunities.

Elmhurst College, inspired by the report, did an environmental audit of civic learning and democratic engagement on its campus and then used the Crucible’s chart, A Framework for 21st century Civic Learning as a standard to identify where student affairs in particular was addressing or omitting to address various dimensions of civic knowledge, skills, values, and action. They then created a Civic Action Plan for how to monitor their progress in closing the identified gaps and keeping up a rich array of opportunities for students’ civic learning.

Other campuses have used A Crucible Moment for a faculty development summer institute (University of Wisconsin), used the report for a campus-wide discussion (Keene State University), used sections of Crucible to train student leaders and use their new knowledge in student clubs, assigned chapters from the pdf in courses (University of Wisconsin), and used sections of it with their community partners (University of Pennsylvania).

C. Leadership Coalitions: AAC&U and the CLDE Network
AAC&U has long emphasized the foundational ties between “liberal education” and education for informed, responsible democratic participation. In that spirit, we formed the CLDE Action Network, convened by Caryn McTighe Musil, which is committed to enhance coordinated strategies that advance Crucible Moment goals. Each of the 13 is a national organization with extensive reach, each member attended the CLDE National Roundtables, and each functions through their strong infrastructures as important ongoing arenas for sustained commitment to making civic learning expected rather than optional for college students. Together they reach some 2,000 universities and colleges (both two-year and four-year) and include more than 8 million students.

The CLDE Action Network includes: The American Association of State Colleges and Universities (AACCU); The Anchor Intuitions; The Association of American Colleges and Universities (AAC&U); the Bonner Foundation; Bringing Theory to Practice: Campus Compact: The Center for Information and Research on Civic Learning and Engagement (CIRCLe); The Democracy Commitment; Imagining America; The interfaith Youth Corps; The Kettering Foundation; NASPA: Association for Higher Education Student Affairs Professionals; and The New England Resource Center for Higher Education (NERCHE).

D. Publications
AAC&U’s Quarterly Journal, Diversity and Democracy: Civic Learning for Shared Futures
Already a vehicle that has been capturing campus-based civic work for sixteen years (first under the title Diversity Digest), Diversity and Democracy focused its Fall 2013 issue on Higher Education for Civic Learning and Democratic Engagement informed deeply by the CLDE project. Since then it has kept up a steady focus on the recommendations flowing from A Crucible Moment and how campuses are putting them into practice. Other especially relevant thematic issues include: Transformative Partnerships at Home and Abroad (Winter 2013); Assessing Students’ Diversity, Global, and Civic Learning Gains (Summer 2013); Collaborating for Civic Learning: Student and Academic Affairs done in partnership with NASPA (Fall 2013); New Technologies: Implications for Higher Education’s Democratic Mission (Winter 2014); and General Education and Democratic Engagement (Summer 2014).
Imagining America’s Launches New Publication called Public
This new online peer-reviewed and multimedia journal features projects, pedagogies, resources, and ideas that demonstrate how to incorporate humanities, arts, and design in public life and as a means of constructing democratic societies and cultivating democratic culture. Its first publication appeared in 2014.

Bringing Theory to Practice Civic Series
This CLDE Action network partner committed to producing a civic series in in the last two years that has included Civic Provocations; Civic Values, Civic Practices; Civic Studies; and Civic Engagement, Civic Development, and Higher Education. Its last volume Civic Learning and Teaching should be out before the end of 2014. All publications are available in print and free in PDF website versions.

Kettering Foundation Higher Education Exchange Journal
This CLDE AN partner produces an annual publication intended to develop more democratic societies through the exchange of ideas between scholars and the larger public.

Individual CLDE AN Publications
Though there have been a host of these, two deserve special mention. The Bonner Foundation produced Deepening Community Engagement in Higher Education: Forging New Pathways and NERCHE director co-authored To Serve a Larger Purpose: Engagement for Democracy and the Transformation of Higher Education.

E. Selective Sponsored Project Initiatives by CLDE Action Network Members
Bridging Cultures to Form a Nation: Community, Difference, and Democratic Thinking (2012-2015)
The National Endowment for the Humanities awarded AAC&U and its partner, The Democracy Commitment, a three-year faculty and curriculum development grant for community colleges. The project seeks to integrate civic scholarship and pedagogies across high enrollment transfer and degree completion humanities courses to deepen democratic understanding and capacities.

NASPA’s Lead Initiative on Civic Learning and Democratic Engagement (2012-present)
Initiated in 2012, this ongoing project now involves 73 NASPA member colleges and universities committed to encouraging and highlighting the work of student affairs in making education for a diverse democracy part of every student’s college education. The schools are building clde activities into student affairs strategic goals and learning outcomes, collecting data on students’ civic learning, and collaborating with students on strategies that help solve community problems through collective action.

Civic Learning and Democratic Engagement Action Collaborative (Chicago and Philadelphia)
The Robert M. McCormick Foundation awarded AAC&U a grant from 2012-2013 to create a two-part Chicago CLDE Action Collaborative to help twelve institutions create more civic-minded colleges and universities across domains and disciplines. AAC&U partnered with Illinois Campus Compact and Interfaith Youth Core. In 2014, the McCormick Foundation funded a Chicago-based project to infuse civic inquiry and action across disciplines, especially in upper division courses. In 2014-2015, AAC&U is funding a similar Philadelphia CLDE Action Collaborative in partnership with Pennsylvania Campus Compact to work with twelve colleges and universities seeking to use A Crucible Moment recommendations to help foster more civic-minded institutions.

Bonner Foundation High-Impact Initiative: Integrating High –Impact Learning and Community Engagement: AAC&U and NERCHE are partnering with the Bonner Foundation in its multi-year project that spans 2012-2016 and is now composed of 23 colleges and universities. Caryn McTighe Musil of AAC&U and John Saltmarsh of NERCHE serve as ongoing consultants for the project that seeks to make civic learning more pervasive on campus and more beneficial to communities off campus.

The Kettering Foundation
The Kettering Foundation has initiated a series of partnerships with CLDE AN partners. AAC&U and Kettering are working on a project examining the relationship of educating for citizenship to educating for work. Kettering and The Democracy Commitment are examining how community colleges can offer leadership on education for democracy. Kettering is partnering with AASCU and its American Democracy Project to explore how to assess civic learning.

BTtoP’s Funding Call for Civic Proposals
Bringing Theory to Practice has been an important partner in promoting information about A Crucible Moment in its newsletter and in its new monograph, Civic Provocations. In 2012, BTtoP also issued a broad call for proposals intended to foster deeper understandings about the centrality of higher education’s civic mission and received a landslide of proposals. The call will help support campus dialogues, research, publications, and curricular and campus wide initiatives.

Degree Qualifications Profile and Tuning
Over 400 colleges, universities, and community colleges participated in a set of projects designed to beta test a proposed framework for 21st century degrees that was released in 2011 by the Lumina Foundation and will be released in its revised form October 8, 2014. The DQP makes civic learning one of five expected component elements. AAC&U and AASCU are both involved in DQP projects with state systems and partner campuses within those systems.

Assessing Civic Learning
AAC&U and AASCU’s Civic Learning Assessment Task Force produced a publication that offered profiles of the purpose, cost, administration, and outcomes of the major existing civic learning assessment instruments and made it available free on their respective websites.
